

Some of the following activities are potentially violations of New Zealand copyright law, indicate with a cross those activities which you feel are likely to be violations of New Zealand copyright law

- Copying the organisation or structure of another piece of work
- Creating a new piece of work on the same theme as an existing one but in a new context and without directly copying the existing one
- Copying sections from another source with an acknowledgement, for a published work
- Downloading music from an online anonymous peer-to-peer service for your own use
- Taking a photograph of a friend standing next to a work of sculpture
- Copying sections from another source with an acknowledgement, for an assignment
- Photocopying several chapters from a book in the library to give to a friend
- Copying a music CD to tape so you can play it in your car
- Copying a friends music CD to MP3 so you can play a song on your computer
- Taking a photograph of a five hundred year old work of art by an old master in a gallery
- Buying a complete piece of work in order to submit it for an assignment
- Purchasing a bootleg CD of music while on holiday and bringing it back to NZ for your own personal use
- Having created a work in collaboration with someone else, you make it available on the internet without discussing it with them
- Copying an old record to CD so it doesn't get scratched from use
- Copying a web site and putting your own words and name into the content part of the pages
- Photocopying a 100 year old edition of a popular novel for your own use and enjoyment
- Photocopying a 100 year old edition of a popular novel and selling it to a friend
- Taking a tape recorder to a public musical performance of a new band and recording it to listen to again later